Vulnerability to terrorist attack is not restricted to the most obvious sites of political violence, religious or cultural persecution. It is also evident in the most remote and isolated areas of the world, where the fear of violence and the threat of death are omnipresent. In these areas, the identity of the individual is often closely linked to the identity of the group to which they belong. In times of conflict, this can lead to a loss of identity, as people are forced to leave their homes and communities, and often to give up their cultural and religious traditions. The loss of identity can have serious consequences, as it can lead to a sense of dislocation and a lack of belonging. In some cases, it can also lead to a loss of hope and a sense of despair. In these situations, it is important to support individuals and communities in maintaining their identity, and to help them to reconnect with their cultural and religious traditions. This can be done through a range of interventions, such as the provision of support services, the promotion of community-based initiatives, and the provision of training and education.
